

Let's Have A Relay 2026
I Ring

I:1 Miles > Schwar & Kate

The drowned dove flower is native to Xip'uupát and used to honor some deities, especially Súósichí, the freshwater deity.

At freshwater temples, doves were drowned into a basin of freshwater from the rivers as a sacrifice to Súósichí. On large holidays, villages celebrate around the fire pit and socialize.

One member, Shupúú, sat close to the fire to stay warm and kept to themselves. Another member decided to sit next to Shupúú and invited them into the woods to wander.

As they were walking, Shupúú was shoved into a large tree. They shouted as someone bit at their neck. A flash of light appeared, casting a shadow onto the tree.

They continued to gnaw into Shupúú's neck, while the fire behind them grew more violent. Once their neck was split, Shupúú screamed one last time and rain fell from the sky.

Some villagers went to inspect the scream and found a pile of wet ashes and bones. They were drunk so they ignored it. Once they returned, they found the ashes and bones gone but instead found white flowers bloomed with a dark center.

These flowers became known as drowned dove flowers because of this. When an offering needs made to the freshwater deity, villagers use these flowers instead of doves.

A drowned dove was found by the flowery bird dieties of Xipúúpá púnáá Sichuu. Within this pantheon is also a deity known as Súúsichi, the fresh-water deity.

Across the river, near the fresh-water temple, the drowned dove was sent in a cauldron of fresh-water. As this happened, the surrounding farm-houses got drunk around the hearth while making merry with friends in celebration.

The younger among them placed the dove by a fire. The elder, acting cruelly, shoved the younger aside and took the dove into the forest.

The younger followed the elder, as they placed the dove into the conifer, and the dove began to scream as the elder began to bite the doves neck. After which something bright shone in the shadow of the conifer.

The elder repeatedly bit into the doves neck, as a fire inside them began to rise like an orca. As it thundered, the doves neck was left with lightning like wounds, and the dove screamed once more as rain fell on the fire.

The people of the farm-houses followed the sounds of the screams, only to find a pile of wet ash and bones. As it rained, they continued to drink and dance in memory of the dove. As it thundered, they arrived by the conifer and found white ashes in a bowl of fully expanded dark roots.

As it rained, this story grew these flowers that knew how be seen like the drowned dove. When the people of the farm-houses die, they send these flowers to each other and to the doves, so that they may die peacefully and be sent to Súúsichi.

I:2 Schwar & Kate > R. Night Petrichor

A drowned dove was found by the flowery bird dieties of Xipúúpá púnáá Sichuu. Within this pantheon is also a deity known as Súúsichi, the fresh-water deity.

Across the river, near the fresh-water temple, the drowned dove was sent in a cauldron of fresh-water. As this happened, the surrounding farm-houses got drunk around the hearth while making merry with friends in celebration.

The younger among them placed the dove by a fire. The elder, acting cruelly, shoved the younger aside and took the dove into the forest.

The younger followed the elder, as they placed the dove into the conifer, and the dove began to scream as the elder began to bite the doves neck. After which something bright shone in the shadow of the conifer.

The elder repeatedly bit into the doves neck, as a fire inside them began to rise like an orca. As it thundered, the doves neck was left with lightning like wounds, and the dove screamed once more as rain fell on the fire.

The people of the farm-houses followed the sounds of the screams, only to find a pile of wet ash and bones. As it rained, they continued to drink and dance in memory of the dove. As it thundered, they arrived by the conifer and found white ashes in a bowl of fully expanded dark roots.

As it rained, this story grew these flowers that knew how be seen like the drowned dove. When the people of the farm-houses die, they send these flowers to each other and to the doves, so that they may die peacefully and be sent to Súúsichi.

There is a water god that is called Súúsichi of potable water among the people of Xipúúpá púnáá Sichuu. They once found a drowned dove with the god's flower.

Across the river, on sacred lands, they put a drowned dove into a fire basket. Farmers drank by a big fire that danced with friends celebrating while they did this. Their child put the dove by the fire. The elder shoved the child cruelly and took the dove into the forest. The child followed the elder and heard the dove that screamed because the elder bit the dove's neck. The elder dug into the neck with his teeth because fire did not touch it. The neck bled and the sky thundered. The dove screamed, and the sky wept on the fire in the big tree's shadow.

The farmers followed the screams. They only found cremains. The kept weeping, and they drank and mourned the dove. The sky thundered, and they went to the big tree and found white cremains in a flower's black roots.

It rains, and this story tends the flower that mourns the drowned dove. If a farmer dies, they give flowers to them and the dove, thus they die peacefully and be with Súúsichi.

I:3 R. Night Petrichor > Juno

There is a water god that is called Súúsichi of potable water among the people of Xipúúpá púnáá Sichuu. They once found a drowned dove with the god's flower.

Across the river, on sacred lands, they put a drowned dove into a fire basket. Farmers drank by a big fire that danced with friends celebrating while they did this. Their child put the dove by the fire. The elder shoved the child cruelly and took the dove into the forest. The child followed the elder and heard the dove that screamed because the elder bit the dove's neck. The elder dug into the neck with his teeth because fire did not touch it. The neck bled and the sky thundered. The dove screamed, and the sky wept on the fire in the big tree's shadow.

The farmers followed the screams. They only found cremains. They kept weeping, and they drank and mourned the dove. The sky thundered, and they went to the big tree and found white cremains in a flower's black roots.

It rains, and this story tends the flower that mourns the drowned dove. If a farmer dies, they give flowers to them and the dove, thus they die peacefully and be with Súúsichi.

Those who lived there did name the Waters from the Platform of Steam and Stone as sacred to Sushidzhi. A white bird saw the flowers of the Drowning God.

A white bird put a cage of flames from out of the huge flow of water on the sacred land. The farmer made a very large fire at the booze and friends party. A child placed a white bird near the flames.

The elder child evilly struck the white bird as they went for the few trees. The elder child followed a sound of crying and screaming. They made teeth and claw on their necks, but the flame did not touch them. The neck did bleed, then the Greatceiling rumbled. The white bird cried out while rain came out of the Greatceiling onto a burnt black tree.

The farmer followed and shouted. He saw only cremains. It rained, they drank, then the white bird mourned. The Greatceiling continued to rumble above the tops of the trees. Below were white cremains, at black roots of the flowers.

The white bird continued to mourn for rain and imaginary flowers. If the farmer dies and their white bird is given flowers, then all the dead people shall be with peace with Sushidzhi...

I:4 Juno > Jake

Those who lived there did name the Waters from the Platform of Steam and Stone as sacred to Sushidzhi. A white bird saw the flowers of the Drowning God.

A white bird put a cage of flames from out of the huge flow of water on the sacred land. The farmer make a very large fire at the booze and friends party. A child placed a white bird near the flames.

The elder child evilly struck the white bird as they went for the few trees. The elder child followed a sound of crying and screaming. They made teeth and claw on their necks, but the flame did not touch them. The neck did bleed, then the Greatceiling rumbled. The white bird cried out while rain came out of the Greatceiling onto a burnt black tree.

The farmer followed and shouted. He saw only cremains. It rained, they drank, then the white bird mourned. The Greatceiling continued to rumble above the tops of the trees. Below were white cremains, at black roots of the flowers.

The white bird continued to mourn for rain and imaginary flowers. If the farmer dies and their white bird is given flowers, then all the dead people shall be with peace with Sushidzhi...

Someone called Water lived on Susídze's sacred geyser plateau. A white bird found the flower with Psyaz.

The white bird perched on a geyser plateau brazier. The farmers lit the biggest fire in the liquor. A child put some white birds near the fire. The oldest child hit the lamest white bird while going to the trees. The oldest child made a bird cry with a shout and then, without having touched the fire, his neck bleeds, and the sky thundered. The person, as the white birds cried, departed heaven and then went to the trees burnt black.

The farmers, shouting, followed. They only saw remains. These people drank water, and then the white bird could ask for release. The sky thundered by the top of the big trees. There was white water underneath. Black cosmos grew on the bottom.

The white bird asked for people's forgiveness with the flower story. If in the farmers' deaths you give flowers to the white bird, you will live in peace in Susídze.

I:5 Jake > Madeline

Someone called Water lived on Susídze's sacred geyser plateau. A white bird found the flower with Psyaz.

The white bird perched on a geyser plateau brazier. The farmers lit the biggest fire in the liquor. A child put some white birds near the fire. The oldest child hit the lamest white bird while going to the trees. The oldest child made a bird cry with a shout and then, without having touched the fire, his neck bleeds, and the sky thundered. The person, as the white birds cried, departed heaven and then went to the trees burnt black.

The farmers, shouting, followed. They only saw remains. These people drank water, and then the white bird could ask for release. The sky thundered by the top of the big trees. There was white water underneath. Black cosmos grew on the bottom.

The white bird asked for people's forgiveness with the flower story. If in the farmers' deaths you give flowers to the white bird, you will live in peace in Susídze.

The farmer named Muvuku lived at the sacred hotspring, named Susidse, on the plateau. A white bird finds a quail spirit's flower and the spirit, named Myas, becomes a white bird. Spirit will poison people who overindulge on bird meat.

Myas perches on hotspring plateau's brazier and they see. The farmer's children create a fire from the fuel and the fire was big. The child places white birds around the fire. An old child hits a gamey bird around the tree. Myas forces the sky to thunder and lightning strike tree. The bleeding bird caws and the old child shouts. Children move toward blackened burned tree. Myas caws and flies toward them.

The farmer moves toward his children and the farmer shouts toward his children. He sees his birds-eating children. Children beseech the spirit, Myas, to forgive them, so they drink sacred hotspring water. Sky thunders around large trees. Myas creates black cosmos in the pale river under the trees.

Myas demands they sacrifice. Muvuku holds a poison flower in his hand, in order to spare his children. Susidse will be peaceful when poison flower kills the farmer.

I:6 Madeline > Danielle

The farmer named Muvuku lived at the sacred hotspring, named Susidse, on the plateau. A white bird finds a quail spirit's flower and the spirit, named Myas, becomes a white bird. Spirit will poison people who overindulge on bird meat.

Myas perches on hotspring plateau's brazier and they see. The farmer's children create a fire from the fuel and the fire was big. The child places white birds around the fire. An old child hits a gamey bird around the tree. Myas forces the sky to thunder and lightning strike tree. The bleeding bird caws and the old child shouts. Children move toward blackened burned tree. Myas caws and flies toward them.

The farmer moves toward his children and the farmer shouts toward his children. He sees his birds-eating children. Children beseech the spirit, Myas, to forgive them, so they drink sacred hotspring water. Sky thunders around large trees. Myas creates black cosmos in the pale river under the trees.

Myas demands they sacrifice. Muvuku holds a poison flower in his hand, in order to spare his children. Susidse will be peaceful when poison flower kills the farmer.

On a plateau, there was a sacred oasis called Susidse, and at this sacred oasis lived a farmer named Mubuku. A spirit named Myas, in the form of a white bird, found the vulture's flower. And so the spirit was going to poison the people who eat too much bird-flesh.

Myas perched upon the oasis plateau's hearth and watched. The farmer's children set fuel ablaze, and the fire grew tall. One child placed white birds around the fire. The older child beat a gamey bird near a palm tree. Myas forced the sky to thunder, but the lightning struck the tree. The bleeding bird cried out, and the older child screamed. The children ran towards the blackened, burnt palm tree. Myas made bird-cries as he flew away from them.

The farmer ran toward her children, calling to them. She saw that her children had eaten birds. The children begged Myas, and drank the sacred water of the oasis, so that the spirit might forgive them. The sky thundered above the tall trees. In the bright stream beneath the trees, Myas brought his dark datura to life.

Myas commanded a sacrifice. Mubuku, bringing mercy to her children, took the poison flower in her hand. The poisonous flower would kill the farmer, and Susidse would remain in peace.

I:7 Danielle > Keras

On a plateau, there was a sacred oasis called Susidse, and at this sacred oasis lived a farmer named Mubuku. A spirit named Myas, in the form of a white bird, found the vulture's flower. And so the spirit was going to poison the people who eat too much bird-flesh.

Myas perched upon the oasis plateau's hearth and watched. The farmer's children set fuel ablaze, and the fire grew tall. One child placed white birds around the fire. The older child beat a gamey bird near a palm tree. Myas forced the sky to thunder, but the lightning struck the tree. The bleeding bird cried out, and the older child screamed. The children ran towards the blackened, burnt palm tree. Myas made bird-cries as he flew away from them.

The farmer ran toward her children, calling to them. She saw that her children had eaten birds. The children begged Myas, and drank the sacred water of the oasis, so that the spirit might forgive them. The sky thundered above the tall trees. In the bright stream beneath the trees, Myas brought his dark datura to life.

Myas commanded a sacrifice. Mubuku, bringing mercy to her children, took the poisonous flower in her hand. The poisonous flower would kill the farmer, and Susidse would remain in peace.

On a plateau there was a sacred oasis whose name was Tuserise. Here there dwelt a farmer whose name was Mumbukho. There was a spirit whose name was Miasa and who resembled a bird. The spirit had found a vulture's flower and then, having eaten too much bird meat, intended to poison a person.

At the plateau oasis Miasa sat by a fire and watched. The farmer's children burnt firewood and the fire became big. A child put white feathers near the fire and then the children's father smelt a strong smell by a palm tree. Miasa was flying and the flash struck the palm tree. The bleeding bird then screamed and the children's father cried out. Then the children ran to a burning black palm tree. Miasa, running from them, made the bird scream.

The farmer called to his his children and ran to them. He saw that his children were eating a bird. The children drank the sacred oasis water and then pleaded with Miasa for mercy from the spirit. The clouds then swirled while, in a white spring below the clouds, Miasa brought a dark poisonous flower to life.

Miasa demanded a sacrifice. Mumbukho got mercy for the children and then gave a poisonous flower. The flower will kill the farmer and because of this Tuserise will be at peace.

I:8 Keras > Matthijs

On a plateau there was a sacred oasis whose name was Tuserise. Here there dwelt a farmer whose name was Mumbukho. There was a spirit whose name was Miasa and who resembled a bird. The spirit had found a vulture's flower and then, having eaten too much bird meat, intended to poison a person.

At the plateau oasis Miasa sat by a fire and watched. The farmer's children burnt firewood and the fire became big. A child put white feathers near the fire and then the children's father smelt a strong smell by a palm tree. Miasa was flying and the flash struck the palm tree. The bleeding bird then screamed and the children's father cried out. Then the children ran to a burning black palm tree. Miasa, running from them, made the bird scream.

The farmer called to his his children and ran to them. He saw that his children were eating a bird. The children drank the sacred oasis water and then pleaded with Miasa for mercy from the spirit. The clouds then swirled while, in a white spring below the clouds, Miasa brought a dark poisonous flower to life.

Miasa demanded a sacrifice. Mumbukho got mercy for the children and then gave a poisonous flower. The flower will kill the farmer and because of this Tuserise will be at peace.

There was a good oasis on a high plateau; its name was Tuserise.

a farmer lived there; his name was Mumbukho.

there was a spirit; its name was Miasa; it seemed like a bird.

The spirit now discovered a flower near a vulture, and now consumed too much bird meat, and sought to poison a person.

While sitting beside a fire next to the plateau oasis, Miasa watched.

After the children of the farmer burned firewood, the fire grew.

A child lay down a white feather beside the fire. Then the father of the children smelled an intense smell by a palm tree.

As Miasa flew, the flare hit the palm tree.

The bleeding bird cried. Then the father of the children called out and the children fled the burnt black palm tree.

Miasa ran from them while the bird screamed.

The farmer called out to the children to run, and then the children saw they were eating a bird.

The children drank good oasis water, while imploring Miasa, that they desired mercy from the spirit.

Then it moved like a swirling cloud, and the cloud went to a bright natural spring. Miasa gave life to a dark poison flower.

Miasa demanded a human sacrifice. Mumbukho obtained mercy for the children but Miasa gave (him) a poison flower.

The flower killed the farmer. And because of this Tuserise will have peace.

I:9 Matthijs > Nemo

There was a good oasis on a high plateau; its name was Tuserise.

a farmer lived there; his name was Mumbukho.

there was a spirit; its name was Miasa; it seemed like a bird.

The spirit now discovered a flower near a vulture, and now consumed too much bird meat, and sought to poison a person.

While sitting beside a fire next to the plateau oasis, Miasa watched.

After the children of the farmer burned firewood, the fire grew.

A child lay down a white feather beside the fire. Then the father of the children smelled an intense smell by a palm tree.

As Miasa flew, the flare hit the palm tree.

The bleeding bird cried. Then the father of the children called out and the children fled the burnt black palm tree.

Miasa ran from them while the bird screamed.

The farmer called out to the children to run, and then the children saw they were eating a bird.

The children drank good oasis water, while imploring Miasa, that they desired mercy from the spirit.

Then it moved like a swirling cloud, and the cloud went to a bright natural spring. Miasa gave life to a dark poison flower.

Miasa demanded a human sacrifice. Mumbukho obtained mercy for the children but Miasa gave (him) a poison flower.

The flower killed the farmer. And because of this Tuserise will have peace.

Atop a tall hill, there was a sweet well. Its name was Tüsélisa. There was a farmer in that land. His name was Mümpúho. Also, there was a spirit. It appeared as a bird and was named Mesa. It discovered a flower near a scavenger, which was a bird that ate a lot of meat, then, then, the spirit wanted to poison a person. So, Mesa sat near a fire near the well on the hill, at that time, it searched. Meanwhile, the children of the farmer lit the logs, which then grew into a fire. A child placed a shining feather near the fire, then the father of those children smelt a strong smoke near the tree. Mesa was hovering above, at that time, the flame reached that tree. The bird was bleeding and shouted, and the children called their father. The children had fled from the burnt dark tree. The children cried for the bird, at that time, Mesa fled from the children. The farmer asked the children to flee, but the children looked at the burning bird. The children begged for mercy from the spirit of Mesa, at that time, they drank water of the sweet well. The spirit became a storm, and then went to the shining well. Mesa gave life to the dark and poisoned flower. Mesa demanded to sacrifice a person. Mümpúho obtained mercy for the children, but Mesa gave the poisoned flower to him. That flower killed the farmer. Tüsélisa was peaceful.

Let's Have A Relay 2026
E Ring

E:1 Miles > Eiran

The drowned dove flower is native to Xip'uupát and used to honor some deities, especially Súósichí, the freshwater deity.

At freshwater temples, doves were drowned into a basin of freshwater from the rivers as a sacrifice to Súósichí. On large holidays, villages celebrate around the fire pit and socialize.

One member, Shupúú, sat close to the fire to stay warm and kept to themselves. Another member decided to sit next to Shupúú and invited them into the woods to wander.

As they were walking, Shupúú was shoved into a large tree. They shouted as someone bit at their neck. A flash of light appeared, casting a shadow onto the tree.

They continued to gnaw into Shupúú's neck, while the fire behind them grew more violent. Once their neck was split, Shupúú screamed one last time and rain fell from the sky.

Some villagers went to inspect the scream and found a pile of wet ashes and bones. They were drunk so they ignored it. Once they returned, they found the ashes and bones gone but instead found white flowers bloomed with a dark center.

These flowers became known as drowned dove flowers because of this. When an offering needs made to the freshwater deity, villagers use these flowers instead of doves.

Dove was drowned to find Our Rock Under the Clouds' flowers over some plant deities. This one deity in the Pantheon of Gods is Freshwater-Maker, the Freshwater Deity.

Doves lie down to drown like death to give to Freshwater-Maker inside their freshwater cauldron to see streams at Freshwater-Maker's Temple. Farmhouses (habitually eat) at the friend-pyre upon their holiday.

A younger sibling (of Dove) sits with Dove, becoming hot and lonely. Their (Dove's) older sibling wakes up and would become cold sitting there, they invite Dove over to walk with them in the forest.

They (both) walk while the older sibling makes Dove lie down again by a large tree. They (Dove) begin to scream as the older sibling bites Dove's neck. Something beneficial shines and is made in the shadow of the large tree.

The older sibling continues to bite into Dove's neck's fire while they (both) become animalistic. (It is) Thundering, Dove's neck lies down against (the tree) and lightning strikes it, (Dove) screams while raindrops (fall) towards the fire.

Some farmers wake up and follow the screams through to a wet pile of ashes with wet bones. Raining over freshwater, they grow to forget them (animalistic). Thundering, they arrive at the large tree lightning struck to find the ashes and their bones, nothing but white flowers with a bowl of black roots that ceased to expand.

Raining, this poem grows flowers to know and to see like a dove to drown. Farmers die and send the flower poem between them to give doves when something has begged to die and be given to Freshwater-Maker.

E:2 Eiran > Solar

Dove was drowned to find Our Rock Under the Clouds' flowers over some plant deities. This one deity in the Pantheon of Gods is Freshwater-Maker, the Freshwater Deity.

Doves lie down to drown like death to give to Freshwater-Maker inside their freshwater cauldron to see streams at Freshwater-Maker's Temple. Farmhouses (habitually eat) at the friend-pyre upon their holiday.

A younger sibling (of Dove) sits with Dove, becoming hot and lonely. Their (Dove's) older sibling wakes up and would become cold sitting there, they invite Dove over to walk with them in the forest.

They (both) walk while the older sibling makes Dove lie down again by a large tree. They (Dove) begin to scream as the older sibling bites Dove's neck. Something beneficial shines and is made in the shadow of the large tree.

The older sibling continues to bite into Dove's neck's fire while they (both) become animalistic. (It is) Thundering, Dove's neck lies down against (the tree) and lightning strikes it, (Dove) screams while raindrops (fall) towards the fire.

Some farmers wake up and follow the screams through to a wet pile of ashes with wet bones. Raining over freshwater, they grow to forget them (animalistic). Thundering, they arrive at the large tree lightning struck to find the ashes and their bones, nothing but white flowers with a bowl of black roots that ceased to expand.

Raining, this poem grows flowers to know and to see like a dove to drown. Farmers die and send the flower poem between them to give doves when something has begged to die and be given to Freshwater-Maker.

The flowers see the moon under the cloud, and over their gods; those stars that were drowned. There is one god in the pantheon that made the skies and is the god of the skies.

The sky-maker sent, in their container, the sky and looked for streams around their holy meeting place, and laid down stars that had drowned. Those in the homeland offer burnt sacrifices on that day.

The younger sibling sat with the doves and became hot where he was alone. His sibling woke the older sibling and became cold when they sat, she welcomed the stars into the forest, and they came to her and met her there.

When they arrived the older sibling made them lay down under the trees and they began to scream as the older sibling bit the necks of the stars. They shone and made the canopies great!

The older sibling is biting the fire of the stars' necks and becomes animalistic! She is thundering and lays the stars' necks under the canopies, and makes lightning —the screaming of the stars— while those stars fall as raindrops and fire!

Farmers woke up and followed the screams to a pile of wet bone and wet ashes. Looking for raindrops in the skies, the bones and ashes grew and did not know it. She thundered and arrived around the grand tree. The plants desired her thunder. The ashes and bones saw the stars' flowers with the vessel on the dark tree's limbs, and they grew!

The raindrops saw the story of the flowers grow, they knew and saw the brightness drown. The farmers died and sent them to her story that is the flower showed the stars how to beg that something would die and be sent to the World maker.

E:3 Solar > Tincture

The flowers see the moon under the cloud, and over their gods; those stars that were drowned. There is one god in the pantheon that made the skies and is the god of the skies.

The sky-maker sent, in their container, the sky and looked for streams around their holy meeting place, and laid down stars that had drowned. Those in the homeland offer burnt sacrifices on that day.

The younger sibling sat with the doves and became hot where he was alone. His sibling woke the older sibling and became cold when they sat, she welcomed the stars into the forest, and they came to her and met her there.

When they arrived the older sibling made them lay down under the trees and they began to scream as the older sibling bit the necks of the stars. They shone and made the canopies great!

The older sibling is biting the fire of the stars' necks and becomes animalistic! She is thundering and lays the stars' necks under the canopies, and makes lightning —the screaming of the stars— while those stars fall as raindrops and fire!

Farmers woke up and followed the screams to a pile of wet bone and wet ashes. Looking for raindrops in the skies, the bones and ashes grew and did not know it. She thundered and arrived around the grand tree. The plants desired her thunder. The ashes and bones saw the stars' flowers with the vessel on the dark tree's limbs, and they grew!

The raindrops saw the story of the flowers grow, they knew and saw the brightness drown. The farmers died and sent them to her story that is the flower showed the stars how to beg that something would die and be sent to the World maker.

Flowers watch an eye under a cow and over a harvest of drowned barley.

The plentiful barley in the field was created and ruled over by the stars in the sky. For as the stars in the sky were laid down, so was the barley created beside a lake in the homeland. In the homeland, on one day of the barley harvest, a cow must be offered for sacrifice and immolated.

As the sacrifice burned, a young boy worked in the firelight. His brother woke up, sat beside him and worked until the sacrifice cooled. Then the brothers welcomed spark-bugs to the trees and watched as the bugs came.

When the insects arrived, the siblings lay down under the trees but did not sleep. The insects attacked the siblings by biting and said great words to them. The insects fed themselves on the trees and glowed and grew large.

The two siblings, attacked by biting, grew wings. The wind said great words to them and laid their heads down under the trees and, with powerful great words of the stars, created a great light, and the insects were immolated until they died and fell in the water.

The plentiful barley heard the powerful great words and awoke, and saw bones and ashes in the water. The water knew that it was being looked at, and knew the powerful great words of the water, but it grew!

The siblings arrived by wing at a great tree. In the starlight they saw the drowned flowers and the lake next to the dark great tree. The rain saw the flowers' growing words and knew and saw the drowned light. The plentiful barley slept, and offered flowers to the elder brother's words. The flowers needed to be given to one attacked by biting, and made him see a method. By this method the flowers wished to die.

E:4 Tincture > Carl

Flowers watch an eye under a cow and over a harvest of drowned barley.

The plentiful barley in the field was created and ruled over by the stars in the sky. For as the stars in the sky were laid down, so was the barley created beside a lake in the homeland. In the homeland, on one day of the barley harvest, a cow must be offered for sacrifice and immolated.

As the sacrifice burned, a young boy worked in the firelight. His brother woke up, sat beside him and worked until the sacrifice cooled. Then the brothers welcomed spark-bugs to the trees and watched as the bugs came.

When the insects arrived, the siblings lay down under the trees but did not sleep. The insects attacked the siblings by biting and said great words to them. The insects fed themselves on the trees and glowed and grew large.

The two siblings, attacked by biting, grew wings. The wind said great words to them and laid their heads down under the trees and, with powerful great words of the stars, created a great light, and the insects were immolated until they died and fell in the water.

The plentiful barley heard the powerful great words and awoke, and saw bones and ashes in the water. The water knew that it was being looked at, and knew the powerful great words of the water, but it grew!

The siblings arrived by wing at a great tree. In the starlight they saw the drowned flowers and the lake next to the dark great tree. The rain saw the flowers' growing words and knew and saw the drowned light. The plentiful barley slept, and offered flowers to the elder brother's words. The flowers needed to be given to one attacked by biting, and made him see a method. By this method the flowers wished to die.

the eyes flowers that are drowned beneath a beast are watching bulrushes being picked

the bulrushes in the plentiful field were created and ruled by the stars of the sky

indeed, like the stars were put onto the sky, the bulrushes, too, were created next to the lake in the homeland

in the homeland, on the day of picking the bulrushes, a beast was roasted and sacrificed

while roasting the sacrificed one, a young one stoked the fire

the young one's brother stood up, sat down next to the young one, and kept working until the sacrificed one had cooled down

then the two brothers welcomed some fireflies to the forest and saw them, and the fireflies came to them

while the fireflies were coming to the forest, the two brothers laid themselves down under the trees, but they did not sleep

the two brothers were bitten by the fireflies, and they spoke great words to the two of them

the fireflies fed them wood, and the two of them began to glow and they became large

the two bitten brothers got wings

the wind spoke great words to the two brothers, and it laid their heads under the trees

then, with great, powerful words, it created the great starlights, and until it quieted down, the fireflies kept glowing, and then they went into the water

the plentiful bulrushes spoke great, powerful words and arose, and they looked like the bones in the lake

the water knew that it had been seen, and it knew the great word of desire, and it grew

using their wings, the two brothers arrived at a great tree

under the starlights, the drowned flowers saw them, and they saw also saw the great, dark tree next to the lake, and they grew

the rain saw the flowers' growth, and it knew the light, and it saw it

the plentiful bulrushes slept, and gave older brother's great words to the flowers

the flowers were given to the bitten one, and they gave him the path

that's the way in which flowers must die

E:5 Carl > Biblaridion

the eyes flowers that are drowned beneath a beast are watching bulrushes being picked
the bulrushes in the plentiful field were created and ruled by the stars of the sky
indeed, like the stars were put onto the sky, the bulrushes, too, were created next to the lake in the homeland
in the homeland, on the day of picking the bulrushes, a beast was roasted and sacrificed
while roasting the sacrificed one, a young one stoked the fire
the young one's brother stood up, sat down next to the young one, and kept working until the sacrificed one had cooled down
then the two brothers welcomed some fireflies to the forest and saw them, and the fireflies came to them
while the fireflies were coming to the forest, the two brothers laid themselves down under the trees, but they did not sleep
the two brothers were bitten by the fireflies, and they spoke great words to the two of them
the fireflies fed them wood, and the two of them began to glow and they became large
the two bitten brothers got wings
the wind spoke great words to the two brothers, and it laid their heads under the trees
then, with great, powerful words, it created the great starlights, and until it quieted down, the fireflies kept glowing, and then they went into the water
the plentiful bulrushes spoke great, powerful words and arose, and they looked like the bones in the lake
the water knew that it had been seen, and it knew the great word of desire, and it grew
using their wings, the two brothers arrived at a great tree
under the starlights, the drowned flowers saw them, and they saw also saw the great, dark tree next to the lake, and they grew
the rain saw the flowers' growth, and it knew the light, and it saw it
the plentiful bulrushes slept, and gave older brother's great words to the flowers
the flowers were given to the bitten one, and they gave him the path
that's the way in which flowers must die

Long ago, the aquatic flowers saw the harvesting of the bulrushes under the constellation of the sacred beast. The starry sky brought about abundant plains of bulrushes. Indeed, with nightfall, bulrushes also came to grow in the great homeland next to a lake. There, on the day of the bulrush harvest, while the sacred beast was sacrificed and cooked, a child added fuel to the fire. The child's sibling sat down next to them and kept working until the sacrifice started getting cold. Then, when the two siblings saw some fireflies near the forest, they greeted them and ran toward them. As the fireflies went into the forest, the two siblings sat down under the trees but didn't fall asleep. The fireflies bit them and said magic words to them. As they were fed wood by the fireflies, they became larger, began to glow, and grew wings. Now flying, the siblings said magic words and then put their heads under the trees. Then, using powerful magic, the fireflies kept lighting up to create starlight until it became quiet, and then they went into the water. As the plentiful bulrushes stood up and said powerful magic words, the bones inside the lake were turned to ashes. They knew that the water was seen, but their desire to have a magic word grew. Using their wings, the two siblings arrived at a big tree. Under the starlight, the aquatic flowers saw the siblings and the big black tree next to the lake. The rain saw the light and the flowers growing. The plentiful bulrushes went to sleep as the siblings' magic brought about flowers. The flowers were made to be bitten, creating a path. This is how flowers should be killed.

E:6 Biblaridion > Magpie

Long ago, the aquatic flowers saw the harvesting of the bulrushes under the constellation of the sacred beast. The starry sky brought about abundant plains of bulrushes. Indeed, with nightfall, bulrushes also came to grow in the great homeland next to a lake. There, on the day of the bulrush harvest, while the sacred beast was sacrificed and cooked, a child added fuel to the fire. The child's sibling sat down next to them and kept working until the sacrifice started getting cold. Then, when the two siblings saw some fireflies near the forest, they greeted them and ran toward them. As the fireflies went into the forest, the two siblings sat down under the trees but didn't fall asleep. The fireflies bit them and said magic words to them. As they were fed wood by the fireflies, they became larger, began to glow, and grew wings. Now flying, the siblings said magic words and then put their heads under the trees. Then, using powerful magic, the fireflies kept lighting up to create starlight until it became quiet, and then they went into the water. As the plentiful bulrushes stood up and said powerful magic words, the bones inside the lake were turned to ashes. They knew that the water was seen, but their desire to have a magic word grew. Using their wings, the two siblings arrived at a big tree. Under the starlight, the aquatic flowers saw the siblings and the big black tree next to the lake. The rain saw the light and the flowers growing. The plentiful bulrushes went to sleep as the siblings' magic brought about flowers. The flowers were made to be bitten, creating a path. This is how flowers should be killed.

In the ancient days, the water plants watched the horsetail harvest under the star-sign of the aetosauroid. The starry sky brought about fields of horsetails. Indeed, when night fell, horsetails grew in the land by the river's end.

There, on the day of the horsetail harvest, an aetosauroid was sacrificed and a child kept the fire while it cooked. As she worked, the child's sibling sat next to her, until the sacrifice finished cooking.

In the sea, the siblings saw sea-lights, and went and spoke to them. When they entered the sea-lights' shallows, the siblings sat under a sembina-tree, but did not fall asleep. The sea-lights bit them and taught magic words to them. The sea-lights made the children able to eat wood, and they got bigger, glowed, and grew wings. The flying siblings put their heads under the water and spoke the magic words. Then, in order to become stars, the sea-lights went silent and glowed as they went out to sea.

When they said the powerful magic words, many horsetails stood upright, while bones burned in the river. The plants knew that they were being watched by the water, but they wanted to grow with the magic words. The siblings used their wings to reach a large black tree by the river. Under the stars' light, the water-plants watched them and the tree. The rain watched the lights and the growing plants. The horsetails fell asleep and the siblings' magic made strobili.

In this way, the strobili became able to be cut. That is the manner in which the strobili should be killed.

E:7 Magpie > Jonathan

In the ancient days, the water plants watched the horsetail harvest under the star-sign of the aetosauroid. The starry sky brought about fields of horsetails. Indeed, when night fell, horsetails grew in the land by the river's end.

There, on the day of the horsetail harvest, an aetosauroid was sacrificed and a child kept the fire while it cooked. As she worked, the child's sibling sat next to her, until the sacrifice finished cooking.

In the sea, the siblings saw sea-lights, and went and spoke to them. When they entered the sea-lights' shallows, the siblings sat under a sembina-tree, but did not fall asleep. The sea-lights bit them and taught magic words to them. The sea-lights made the children able to eat wood, and they got bigger, glowed, and grew wings. The flying siblings put their heads under the water and spoke the magic words. Then, in order to become stars, the sea-lights went silent and glowed as they went out to sea.

When they said the powerful magic words, many horsetails stood upright, while bones burned in the river. The plants knew that they were being watched by the water, but they wanted to grow with the magic words. The siblings used their wings to reach a large black tree by the river. Under the stars' light, the water-plants watched them and the tree. The rain watched the lights and the growing plants. The horsetails fell asleep and the siblings' magic made strobili.

In this way, the strobili became able to be cut. That is the manner in which the strobili should be killed.

Long, long ago, some bushes grew by the mouth of a river. The starry sky made the bushes grow, and the seaweed saw the bushes being harvested.

One day, two children slaughtered a cow nearby, then tended a fire and cooked it. The children saw a light in the ocean, so they walked over to it to speak to it. They arrived at the light, and then they sat below a tree. The light spoke to them, and taught them a magic word. The light changed them, making them glow, get larger, and grow wings.

The siblings put their heads into the water, and said the magic word. Then the light became silent and flew away over the ocean, and became a star.

Because of the magic word, the bushes grew. The seaweed saw this, and it wanted to grow, so the children flew away and arrived at a big black tree next to the river. By the starlight, the seaweed watched the children and the tree.

Then the children used their magic to make the bushes fall asleep and grow many berries. That is why bushes now grow edible berries.

E:8 Jonathan > Tethys

Long, long ago, some bushes grew by the mouth of a river. The starry sky made the bushes grow, and the seaweed saw the bushes being harvested.

One day, two children slaughtered a cow nearby, then tended a fire and cooked it. The children saw a light in the ocean, so they walked over to it to speak to it. They arrived at the light, and then they sat below a tree. The light spoke to them, and taught them a magic word. The light changed them, making them glow, get larger, and grow wings.

The siblings put their heads into the water, and said the magic word. Then the light became silent and flew away over the ocean, and became a star.

Because of the magic word, the bushes grew. The seaweed saw this, and it wanted to grow, so the children flew away and arrived at a big black tree next to the river. By the starlight, the seaweed watched the children and the tree.

Then the children used their magic to make the bushes fall asleep and grow many berries. That is why bushes now grow edible berries.

Thorn bushes grew, eating the light of the stars, alongside a river. Water plants saw someone harvesting the thorn bushes.

One day, two children killed a beast by the river, and cooked it with a fire. The children saw a light in the ocean, and went and followed it. They arrived at a tree, and sat under it. Here, the light taught the two children a magic spell. The children submerged their heads in the ocean and said the magic spell. The light made them glow, and made them grow wings for flying. Growing silent, it flew out of the ocean to the sky, to float as a burning star.

The magic spell made the thorn bushes quiet. The water plants wanted to grow like the thorn bushes. The two children flew through the sky, and saw a big black tree. Because of the light from the stars, the water plants obeyed the two children and the tree. Then the children used the spell to make the briar bushes fall asleep and grow fruit to eat. This is why briar bushes grow fruit.

E:9 Tethys > Jason

Thorn bushes grew, eating the light of the stars, alongside a river. Water plants saw someone harvesting the thorn bushes.

One day, two children killed a beast by the river, and cooked it with a fire. The children saw a light in the ocean, and went and followed it. They arrived at a tree, and sat under it. Here, the light taught the two children a magic spell. The children submerged their heads in the ocean and said the magic spell. The light made them glow, and made them grow wings for flying. Growing silent, it flew out of the ocean to the sky, to float as a burning star.

The magic spell made the thorn bushes quiet. The water plants wanted to grow like the thorn bushes. The two children flew through the sky, and saw a big black tree. Because of the light from the stars, the water plants obeyed the two children and the tree. Then the children used the spell to make the briar bushes fall asleep and grow fruit to eat. This is why briar bushes grow fruit.

Cacti grew near a river, feeding on starlight. Water plants watched as the cacti were harvested.

One day, some children killed an animal by the river and cooked it over a fire. Afterward they saw a light over the sea, and they went after it.

It led them to a tree, and they sat beneath it. There, the light taught them a magic spell.

The children dipped their heads beneath the sea and spoke the spell. The light in the sea made the children glow and gave them wings so they could fly. The light grew calm, then rose from the sea into the sky, to be burning stars.

The spell soothed the cacti, but the water plants longed to grow like cacti. The children flew through the sky and saw a great dark tree beside the river. Because of the starlight, the water plants listened to the children there at the tree. Then the children put the cacti to sleep and made them grow fruit to be eaten.

And ever since, cacti bear fruit.

Let's Have A Relay 2026

I Ring <> E Ring

I Ring <> E Ring.

Atop a tall hill, there was a sweet well. Its name was Tüsélisa. There was a farmer in that land. His name was Mümpúho. Also, there was a spirit. It appeared as a bird and was named Mesa. It discovered a flower near a scavenger, which was a bird that ate a lot of meat, then, then, the spirit wanted to poison a person. So, Mesa sat near a fire near the well on the hill, at that time, it searched. Meanwhile, the children of the farmer lit the logs, which then grew into a fire. A child placed a shining feather near the fire, then the father of those children smelt a strong smoke near the tree. Mesa was hovering above, at that time, the flame reached that tree. The bird was bleeding and shouted, and the children called their father. The children had fled from the burnt dark tree. The children cried for the bird, at that time, Mesa fled from the children. The farmer asked the children to flee, but the children looked at the burning bird. The children begged for mercy from the spirit of Mesa, at that time, they drank water of the sweet well. The spirit became a storm, and then went to the shining well. Mesa gave life to the dark and poisoned flower. Mesa demanded to sacrifice a person. Mümpúho obtained mercy for the children, but Mesa gave the poisoned flower to him. That flower killed the farmer. Tüsélisa was peaceful.

Cacti grew near a river, feeding on starlight. Water plants watched as the cacti were harvested.

One day, some children killed an animal by the river and cooked it over a fire. Afterward they saw a light over the sea, and they went after it.

It led them to a tree, and they sat beneath it. There, the light taught them a magic spell.

The children dipped their heads beneath the sea and spoke the spell. The light in the sea made the children glow and gave them wings so they could fly. The light grew calm, then rose from the sea into the sky, to be burning stars.

The spell soothed the cacti, but the water plants longed to grow like cacti. The children flew through the sky and saw a great dark tree beside the river. Because of the starlight, the water plants listened to the children there at the tree. Then the children put the cacti to sleep and made them grow fruit to be eaten.

And ever since, cacti bear fruit.